Traditional Dorms to Get Even More Traditional

A prototype of the layout for one of the new traditional singles.

In a move that has shocked and excited students, Residential Life recently announced that this summer, the South Forty's traditional dorms will be renovated to evoke an even more traditional ambience. The traditional dorms are currently known for offering a more rustic living atmosphere than the modern dorms, and the regressive policy changes are presumed to help take the traditional feel to the next level. The changes range from eliminating electricity and potable water from the dorms, as well as banning women, minorities, and non-landed gentry from voting for College Council representatives.

"I think the plans are kind of retro-cool, you know," said Sandra Olinsky, Residential College Director. "The common rooms will feature oil lamps, which are energy efficient enough for us to take the Green Cup this year! And the shared bathrooms will be remodeled as common outdoor latrines. Once a week, we will even offer sponge baths! It's going to be great for the community to foster these young minds in a more creative environment where they won't be distracted by so many modern luxuries, you know, like basic sanitation and the technological necessities of today's world."

However, a few students are reacting negatively to certain potential side-effects of the plans, such as the random outbreaks of smallpox and polio to which the dorm residents will likely fall victim. Some campus officials have expressed concern regarding the risks of syphilis due to "floor-cest." Additionally, the constant threat of the Austro-Hungarian Empire's encroachment is expected to present an unnecessary source of political and existential stress for freshmen trying to adjust to college life.

"I don't think I need to be infected with smallpox to know what 'traditional life' is like," said nervous pre-frosh Johnny Bobbin as he furiously churned butter in preparation for the pledging process for the Freemason fraternity. "Half the reason I chose Wash U was for their relatively lenient alcohol policies, but I don't know if I have the glassware to adhere to the traditional dorms' open-chalice policy. Plus I don't think I like how mead tastes. I like Mike's Hard Lemonade."

Although construction on the thatched roofs is already underway, it remains unclear how soon the dorms will be ready for students to move-in. Try-outs for intramural jousting will be held once the university can acquire enough pure-bred horses and lances. As of press time, students currently inhabiting traditional dorms were super-gluing themselves to their tempur pedic mattresses in protest against maintenance switching them out for hay mats covered in bed bugs and locusts.

Report: "Student Body" Actually Refers to One Student's Body

A recent ethnographic study at Washington University has revealed that the colloquial expression "student body" does not refer to the university's student population as a whole, but rather the torso, limbs, innards, etc. of sophomore student Grant Logan. It is unclear exactly why Logan, a Chemistry major from Anaheim, California, holds this title.

"I was shocked at first when I found out," says WashU's one and only student body. "I didn't realize everyone had been talking about my body the whole time. I should have worked out more this year!"

Before the report, the term "student body" was commonly thought to refer to all of the students, but the study reveals that this is in fact entirely incorrect, and also highly culturally insensitive.

Much of Washington University's discourse related to the student body cites its geographic, ethnic, and religious diversity. Considering the report's findings, Logan's friends have expressed concern that Logan must be a truly lost, confused, and generally discombobulated individual.

"I mean, shit, I never knew

Freshman Relieved to Have Survived Entire Year with Random Roommate, Satan Jr., The Prince of Darkness

Although he admits it was not always easy, freshman Mike Daniels is relieved to finally be moving out of the freshman dorm room he shared with his random roommate, the spawn of Satan, otherwise known as Satan Junior. Daniels and Satan cohabitated a double on Dardick 2, where they shared a mini-fridge and a microwave, appliances which Satan had not been exposed to during his youth in the fiery underworld.

"Well, I don't think we're going to live together next year," Daniels said as he reflected on his experience rooming with Satan, "but considering his reputation as the epitome of evil, temptation, and the ultimate symbol of deception, he wasn't such a bad guy. We had our ups and downs."

Daniels noted graciously that Satan never sexiled him once, or even left his dirty clothes laying around like some other roommates his friends complained about. However, Daniels admits that Satan has certain qualities which explain why he is likely struggling to find a roommate for Sophomore year, including his tendency to damn people straight to hell under his breath or doom them to an eternity of suffering and pain.

"One time, we were playing poker with our floormates. I knew Satan had at least a three of a kind when he raised the betting stakes from ten meal points to everyone's wicked soul. It was mostly shit like that which I got pretty sick of hearing by second semester," explained Daniels.

When asked how in the world Satan, Prince of Darkness, was ever admitted to Washington University in St. Louis in the first place, the admissions office explained his SAT scores were remarkable, and his common app essay was well-written, vulnerable, and so down-to-earth that it was almost as though it was below the earth. Additionally, the admissions office felt that not enough Wash U students possessed the courage to play devil's advocate in the classroom, so admitting Satan would add a diversity of perspectives. At the end of the day though, they just did not want Harvard to snatch him up.

Pre-Frosh Decides On Losing Her Virginity At WashU

Following a campus tour that took place last week, prospective student Stephanie Johnson decided that Washington University in St. Louis is officially where she wants to lose her virginity.

Along the tour, she took a look inside Lien 106, and was impressed by its ambiance. "It wasn't the steaming rice cooker in the corner, the muddied cleats near the door, or even the running toilet," Johnson explained with a grin across her face. "Maybe it's the tempurpedic beds, or something unexplainable, but I can really see myself having sex for the first time right here."

Taking a break from his heated Legends of Zelda Nintendo 64 game, Lien 106 resident Joshua Andersen answered questions about campus life and specifically remembers Johnson as being very interested in learning more, which is "a good sign," according to Andersen.

"Usually these kids just stand here and make judgments about my dirty room. That girl, uh, Stephanie I think? Yeah, well she kept asking questions and looked really excited to finally be on campus," recalled

Andersen. "This seems like the perfect place for her to have the most awkward sex of her life, and in fact, I'd be happy to have it with her."

Admissions officer Christine Carpenter was happy to hear about Johnson's decision and hopes that other students nationwide choose to lose their virginity at Washington University as well.

"Here, especially for first year students, we try to create the right environment for them to collaborate, engage in meaningful actions to better our community, and exchange bodily fluids," Carpenter accounted. "We want them to put a condom on though, our nursery school is pretty shitty."

Then and Now

Well, WashU, it's just about summertime -- this year has had its ups, its downs, its strikeouts, its sit-ins, and everything in between. Before we let all the precious memories slip away, let's take a look back at the beginning of the school year and reflect on where we were then compared to where we are now.

Pre-Freshman Year, Post Freshman Year

Remember that 100-piece condom variety pack you bought the first week of school? Well, it looks like it remains entirely untouched. In all fairness, you probably realized that 100 sex sessions in one year was ambitious and overly-optimistic, but who could pass up that bulk discount deal, am I right? You were raised in a Sam's Club family, after all. It is unfortunate, though, that you were not able to put a single one of those to use. I guess some things don't actually change that much with time! Better luck next year, champ. Don't forget to check the expiration date.

Pre Gen-Chem, Post Gen-Chem

So you had to take Gen Chem this year. Even after all the terrible, awful, horror-inducing things you heard about WashU's most infamous course, it somehow was immeasurably worse than you expected. After countless hours pulling out your hair over problem sets, haunting nightmares of unbalanced equations and attacks by deadly polymers, the class is FINALLY over. Congratulations. You may have made it out alive -- but, hey, if you didn't, nobody on our staff is pre-med, and we are not here to judge.

Pre Drug-Use, Post Drug-Use

Those before and after pictures of drug users with yellow teeth, balding spots, and facial contusions may be pure propaganda after all. Look how much better off you are today than last September when you were a nerdy and friendless sober loser! Ever since your first bong rip, you have been climbing the social ladder faster than a feral cat climbs a tree in the wild. Good for you, man. Today, you are a regular, good-for-nothing, stoner -- but you are totally cool and popular. With all your new friends, and the surfeit of high-deas you have conjured, your life has new a direction.

Pre Slaughter, Post Slaughter

There was a time not so very long ago that this greasy, mouthwatering bacon strip had a personality and a name. Its name was Miss Eleanor Pigby, and it enjoyed a quaint, albeit high-maintenance, lifestyle somewhere in the Dakotas. This all, of course, was before Miss Pigby was slaughtered, butchered into an assortment of cuts, and cured into the nice rasher of bacon we have today! Hey, maybe this will be on your egg sandwich one day soon. Or maybe that will be from Hamela Anderson or some other poor porker.

he was so messed up inside," explained Logan's roommate, Sam Minkleton. "I've read a lot about the student body -- about its composition, and how it's polarized over almost every issue, and how it elects a new government every single year... and I just never knew they were talking about my buddy, Grant! He's always seemed so stable. Why does he need a new Student Body President every year? Why can't he make decisions for his own body? And why did he elect that doofus Political Science major from our freshman floor?" Since the release of the report's findings, Logan has been reluctantly taking the Connie's Choice suggestions, avoiding too much alcohol intake, and spending an extra night a week at the Athletic Complex in an effort to make the Washington University student body as strong and healthy as it's ever been.

Okay, I'm just going to stick my neck out there and say that the point is undoubtedly the best. I'm really sharp, and I have a good grasp and handle on this type of thing, so I gotta say, it all comes to a point. Plus, the point can come at you from any angle, and though you may try to deflect it, at some point, it will eventually stick.

Counter-Point

Counterpoint
by a Chain-mail Shirt

I get it, Point. Your point points out that the point is valuable and on-point, but I'm afraid I must stop you and counter. The counterpoint is clearly superior as it effectively deflects everything your point is trying to accomplish. Your point barely scratches the surface of this complex discussion, unlike the counterpoint, which combines multiple links to effectively counter your point.

Fraternity Burns Down After Refusing to Let Firefighters in during a "Closed Event"

An unfortunately timed fire broke out last Thursday night during a "closed event" at a campus fraternity house. The firefighters, having not been originally placed on the event's guest list, were absolutely prohibited from entering. The firefighters received 9-1-1 calls from students living in the area who noticed smoke coming from frat row. However, when the firefighters finally arrived at the scene to help put out the flames, they were denied entry.

"They told us they appreciated the fact that we wanted to come inside and help, but apparently they were in the middle of a closed event and we would just have to wait," explained firefighter Tony Rato. "Honestly, I think we were all pretty surprised by their reaction. Our callers are usually happy to have us save their homes from burning to ashes. Anyway, we regrouped outside, and realized if they didn't want us at their stupid closed event, then there were better things we could do with our time. We basically decided fuck these douches, we're going to Harry's."

An interview with fraternity member Jake Hornstein shed further light on the issue. Hornstein revealed that although it was in fact a closed event, the frat is usually open to letting in a group of cute girls -- a demographic which the firefighters reportedly did not represent.

"At the end of the day, their ratio was horrible," Hornstein admitted. "That's all it came down to. We were trying to throw a party, and seven burly, bearded men with fire suits and hoses come knocking on our front door. Completely unsexy. Literally... they were all dudes! For a second, we thought we saw one chick in back, but then we realized that was just another fire dude with long hair. So yeah, that's not a recipe for a chill party if you ask me."

Due to the devastating fire, the fraternity house has entirely burnt down, but the party was apparently super sick. The firefighters, on the other hand, reported finding the drinks at Harry's overpriced and watered down.

Citing Conflicting Finals, Student Asks for Extension on Birthday Shot at Blueberry Hill

With three finals coinciding on the day after her 21st birthday, and considering her history of debilitating hangovers, Junior Sophia Marek asked the bartender at Blueberry Hill to give her a one-time-only extension on her birthday shot.

"I'm under a lot of stress," Marek explained. "I have one final today, AND THREE FINALS tomorrow, and a paper due Wednesday. I haven't done my laundry in weeks! I haven't showered! And now it's my birthday. Like, I can't even handle that. So I thought I'd politely check with the Blue Hill bartender to see if I could get a teensy extension for my birthday shot, you know, for like Friday or something."

"Give who an extension?" distracted bartender Sam Plymouth asked while trying to satisfy various drink and meal orders at the same time as dealing with being short-staffed. "Oh, I remember that girl, yeah... maybe she hasn't heard, but this is a landmark restaurant. We were voted #1 Hamburger and #1 Decor in St. Louis. Chuck Berry plays here regularly. Chuck Berry. Ya heard of him? Of course you have. He is a living legend. So she wants a shot next Friday? Sure, that'll cost her $3.50."

The strategy of asking for extensions has reportedly worked numerous times for Marek in the past. She explained that the combination of her adorable smile and mastery of the brief, well-crafted, e-mail pleas to professors has made her severe procrastination habits hardly a problem at all. Marek said that she has almost never turned in an assignment on-time during her years at Wash U, explaining that there's really no reason to since all of the professors are such pushovers.

"Ughhh, I really don't understand why he wouldn't just give me an extension. I mean, I am so incredibly busy and it's not my fault my birthday just happened to fall on my busiest week of the year. My god this is so unfair," Marek complained as she rolled her eyes.

As of press-time, Marek had plans to spend her 21st birthday studying in the library, but she's optimistic that her roommates will throw her a party this weekend.
