

Wash U and B&D Team up Against Student-led Sexual Assault, Press

Wash U's finest

In recent years, sexual assault cases, especially those which happen on college campuses, have gained more exposure in the national media. In order to address these concerns, Washington University has increased campus event security staff, B&D, to protect of Wash U students who might commit these crimes.

Representatives of the university state that they have always maintained a commitment to their students, putting their futures and reputations first. Given the media attention, Chancellor Wrighton has weighed in saying, "Here at Washington University in St. Louis we treat the issue of sexual assault and harassment with the utmost seriousness. These crimes are appalling, and they have lasting negative impacts on the transgressor." Wrighton went on to say, "First and foremost, it is completely unacceptable that our students are the ones who commit these incidents. They say that all press is good press, but I'm beginning to think that this might be an exception. Thankfully, we believe B&D can help the university regain its proper footing".

Wrighton went on to explain how the ubiquitous fraternity doormen can help protect students. B&D staffers have been trained to execute an ambitious three step manoeuvre which first identifies potential assailants, then prevents their ingress into a party, and finally ensures their continued safety by staying in their immediate vicinity. The third step, however, has proven in field tests to be the most difficult to pull off, and often the officer on duty must attempt to draw the potential victim's attention away from the offenders' advances. This usually includes the tactic of "flirting" with the students in line to "cockblock" harassers. Though the method is unorthodox, Wash U has recognized it to be the most effective way maintaining a student body free of sexual assault allegations.

The success of the B&D program is largely due to Bret Daniels, the head of B&D security. Daniels admits that while the job isn't easy, it is important, saying, "I know its not an attainable goal, but I want every B&D officer out there with the mindset that they're trying to wake up on the forty. We have a duty to the kids, and we have to make sure to do everything in our power to make sure some poor unsuspecting student to wind up with a sexual assault on their record." Daniels' outlook aligns with the university's desire to safeguard their students and ensure that their mandatorily reported record of sexual misconduct is clean.

Preliminary results of the security increase are hopeful with none of the reported cases of sexual assault indicating a student as the aggressor. Wash U is pleased with the results and has stated they are happy their students can finally sleep safe. Incidentally the total number of reported sexual assaults has also slightly declined.

University Holds All-Faculty Meeting to Ruin Sophomore's Upcoming Semester

This Wednesday, Washington University officials held a faculty-wide meeting to ruin sophomore Brynne Milford's upcoming Spring semester. The meeting's goal was to ensure that the classes Milford has picked for next semester will not only make her incredibly busy, but also will be impossibly hard, unfairly graded, and overall make her absolutely miserable.

"She's pre-med, so that makes our jobs a lot easier," said Arts and Sciences Dean Mike DelVecchio. "The hard part is making sure that we're all on the same page here. We want to guarantee that she will fucking hate going to class every single day."

Milford, a PNP major, Spanish minor with a 3.56 GPA and a decently rigorous course load has no idea what she's in for.

"Yeah, I plan on just continuing the PNP track I'm on by taking a few philosophy and psych classes, and I really want to go abroad next year so I'm trying to get ahead in my major. Oh, and I'm in third level Spanish too. And I'm taking Orgo. I could take it over the summer, but I also want an intern-

Senior to Host His First Ever Pong Tournament this Saturday

This Saturday marks a momentous occasion in Senior Chris Goldeen's young life — the hosting of his first Pong tournament. Chris moved off campus this past year and is finally christening his apartment with the open event.

Goldeen, who has never actually played Pong before, reports that he has spent over $3000 dollars on Ebay for old Pong cabinets and home consoles in preparation for the event, and added "I'm not sure how all the fraternities afford these consoles, I guess they must have some pretty successful alumni."

Jared Armstrong of the Beta Rho Omega fraternity has reportedly been coaching Goldeen on how to have the best tournament possible. "Yeah, Jared has been super helpful, he told me I'll need a bunch of solo cups. I'm not really sure why, but I guess people get pretty dehydrated with all that intense gaming. He also said I'll need a lot of 'nattys' which I think means girls named Natalie? So I went on faces and emailed everyone named Natalie an invitation," Goldeen shared.

We spoke to Natalie Freed, one of the many Nalties invited, and asked her about the event. "Oh that Jason kid? Yeah that was strange. Usually I'm like hella down for a pong tournament, but I asked some of my friends and this kid isn't even in a frat and I'm like, who is this guy? And in the email he kept talking about video games and he only sent it to people named

Training to be at the top of his game for Natalie

Natalie." Freed went on to say she could be convinced to go as long as the rest of her floor is going as well.

Goldeen was most recently seen making some last-minute trips to Target to buy some robes upon hearing about naked laps. Goldeen commented that while he expects this party to get as wild as the ones he's never been to, he wants to maintain some semblance of modesty for the Nalties.

Lame-Duck Senator Can't Take A Hint

Mark Udall sending an untimely letter to his ex-voters

Following this month's midterm elections, Senator Mark Udall (D-CO) is having a hard time taking a hint that Colorado voters want to move on. Losing by nearly 3% to Republican Cory Gardner, Udall, just doesn't seem to get it in his current "lame-duck" session.

"I know that I lost an election a couple of weeks ago, but that doesn't mean the people of Colorado don't want me, and election is just an election," explained Udall. "Al Gore lost the presidency but still had more votes than Bush. That means losing an election doesn't always mean more people like the other guy, so that's the way I'm approaching this situation."

Udall's most recent Congressional activity consisted of him voting against a bill that would provide for the construction of the Keystone XL oil pipeline. A controversial bill nonetheless, Colorado voters have voiced their disdain with Udall's antics as this latest action seems to be the last straw between the Senator and the state.

"It's been a long six year relationship, and we've had enough," said voter Stephanie Murray. "Yet he's out there voting on legislation that affects our daily lives like he's still our Senator! I mean he technically is, but you know what I mean."

Over the few weeks since his defeat, Udall has noticed that the voters of Colorado have been acting "distant" and "non-confrontational", but he doesn't see it as a problem, he just thinks that it's indicative of the relationship between people living thousands of miles apart.

"Yeah, they might not have re-elected me but that doesn't mean we still can't see each other," contested Udall. "Some of my constituents aren't responding to emails letting them know what I'm up to in Washington, but maybe that's because internet connection is spotty. We're still as close as we've ever been."

As of press time, Udall still hadn't put away his now-awkward pictures of himself and Coloradans.

ship over the summer. I'll also have to start looking for that next semester too. I'll be fine though, I'm not the only one who's had to do this before," Milford said with a hopeful grin.

The meeting produced "positive" results according to Milford's advisor, Dean Mary Ann Thompson. The group decided on Milford having at least an exam a week, with week right after Spring Break that consists of two essays

(one in Spanish), two exams and at least one pop quiz. Her Philosophy professor has promised to teach her class like a writing-intensive course, even though it isn't, and SHS Doctors have agreed to diagnose or at least infect her with Mono. Following her corresponding lack of sexual activity, Milford's booty call will stop responding to her texts.

"Yeah they kinda brought me in here and told me what's gonna happen next semester," said Milford's booty call, Stephen Barrington. "It kinda sucks that she's gonna have Mono, but we never really had anything going. Well, I guess it's time to look for someone else to help me jack off rather than me having to do it on my own!"

"I can't wait for next semester! The spring is always more fun with things like Mardi Gras, Spring Break, Thurtene and WILD!" said Milford still unaware of the upcoming hell.

Freshman is Kind of a Big Deal, Almost Made it into Penn

Freshman Walter Wilson realized the other day when talking with friends that he had accomplished something special — something which few of his friends could match. He discovered that he was truly part of the upper echelon of the class of 2018.

"So I was talking to my pals the other day," Wilson told our interviewer, "and I just casually mentioned that Penn's campus was pretty nice when I toured it. I expected them to agree, but it turns out none of them had even seen Penn. In fact, I was the only one who had applied!" Wilson exclaimed. "Now I don't want to brag, but not only did I apply to Penn early decision — I got deferred!"

As it so happens, Wilson is part of the elite 17% of undergrads that got rejected from Penn before coming to WashU. Not only that, but he also applied to Duke, Cornell, and even MIT. "Wash U was basically my safety school, if I'm being honest. I think it takes a special kind of person to aim so high," Wilson added. "I mean, some of my friends applied here early decision, and I'm like 'You're wasting your E.D. on a school that's not even in the top 10? Yeah, okay.'"

A resident of Walter's floor, Amanda Smithers, was particularly enamored by her floor-mate's newfound accomplishment. "Man, I never really noticed Walt before, but ever since I found out he applied to all those schools I can't stop thinking about him. Now don't get me wrong, I got rejected from Johns Hopkins and Northwestern like everyone else here, but Penn is just on a whole other level."

We talked to Dr. David Van Gaal, the head of admissions, to find out how rare a resume as impressive as Wilson's truly is. "You know, that's something we always look for in incoming students," Dr. Van Gaal explained, "We always love to see that a prospective student's first choice is an Ivy. It shows ambition and confidence that you just don't see in the early-decisioners. When we caught wind that Mr. Wilson had been deferred from Penn, we accepted him right away." On the subject of how common these students might be, he told us "It's a lot more common than you'd think, but still less than you'd hope. Every year though, we net more and more Ivy League rejects. Hopefully one day we'll get a whole class that's entirely made up of kids like Mr. Wilson."

Ooo, so close!

Wilson has begun using his Common App page to pick up chicks parties and — at the time of printing — has successfully solicited 17 high-fives, 3 makeouts, and a handie with his impressive rejection sheet.

New Tourguide Gives Suspiciously Enthusiastic and Insightful Tours

According to reports from parents and prospective students, Senior Jarred Gibbons has recently been giving exceptionally enthusiastic tours. "He's always been a great tourguide," said Ashley Andrews, President of the Student Admissions Committee. "But lately, he's just been really into it. He can go for hours about anything on campus and often does!" Gibbons has not been wasting any time in delving into the depth of history and meaning of our campus, starting right when they meet at Brooking Hall. Prospective student Britany Smith related Gibbons' level of knowledge saying, "He kept talking about how iconic Brookings was. He compared it to the Statue of Liberty, the Eiffel Tower, the Pyramids, the Washington Monument, the Lincoln Memorial, the Jefferson Memorial; then I lost track. He went on to say how crazy it is that Wash U isn't DC."

Buildings aren't the only thing Gibbons has been excited about. On every tour, he's been able to relay how great all of Wash U's food options are. "I know those gooey nutter butter things are probably like really bad for you, but how can you not eat them when you can taste and feel every crunch in your head, you know?" said Gibbons. "Like you know exactly what is making it taste like that." After witnessing Gibbons' traditional mid-tour meal, those on his tours can get a real sense of what its like to eat at Wash U.

Not one to shy away from the tourguide classics, Gibbons has been giving the bunny statue its due attention. On one tour, he noted its iconic presence on campus saying, "Wait, that's a fucking bunny. What is that doing there? That actually makes no sense. Has anyone ever thought about that? Like there's a bunny in the middle of our campus, and we just walk by and act like it's nothing. What's it doing there?" He subsequently pointed out the George Washington Statue across the field, clarifying that the university is named after him, not Washington state or DC, and how "that's crazy" and "it all makes sense now."

Reactions to Gibbons' tours have been overwhelmingly positive, with both prospective students and parents appreciating his passion for Wash U and his general vivaciousness. "He went on about the ceiling in Holmes Lounge for, like, a really long time," said parent Martha Inglewood. "But I guess it was a really nice ceiling." For his upcoming tours Gibbons is planning on giving a comprehensive overview of the best ceilings on campus and at which angles they are best viewed.

Point

The Darren Wilson case will be a landmark in not only race relations, but also justice as a whole

by Cornel West
Famed educator, actually knows what he's talking about

The shooting of Michael Brown and the events that followed were the beginning of a monumental shift in the zeitgeist of the United States. This tragedy has helped put into perspective where we stand. Clearly something is wrong and action must be taken. This is where the case of Darren Wilson comes in; here is where the action can be taken. This man must be held accountable for his actions. Ultimately, this decision will have further reaching effects than just race relations. It will be a decision that changes law and justice as whole by ensuring that law enforcement is subject to the same laws that they ostensibly enforce.

Counter-Point

I totally agree

By Mark S. Wrighton; Chancellor of Washington University in St. Louis, trying to keep it that way

I could not share these sentiments to a higher degree. We, as a university and as a people, must dedicate ourselves to long-term, sustainable solutions to the societal issues underlying these events. We're embarking on a new era and we must be prepared to turn knowledge into action. It is a always a small group of visionary citizens who can provide an enhanced context by which to allow America to grow as a nation. Truly this marks the beginning of a paradigm shift, a shift in which Washington University in St. Louis hopes to have a central role. That is why we are holding a conference of the issue of the case of Darren Wilson this Saturday from 6:00-6:15 in the basement of Seigle, room L004.

Comparative Critics: An Old Man and a Stoner Reviewing the Same Things

Sun Fatt Chinese Restaurant

Opened at 4:20, just in time for dinner! Hunan style pork was the best I've ever had. Besides that one time back in Nam'. We had just finished a sweep of the forests. My squad had a lot of casualties and needed aid. Luckily, we dodged Charlie and stumbled upon a friendly village. Out walked the most beautiful oriental nymph you've ever seen. After treating the wounded, she served us the best pork I've ever had. Wait a minute, where are we? This is definitely the second best pork I've had though.

It's 4:20, just in time to turn up! Wait, they sell food? Oh man, what should I order though? Shit. Wait. Shit. They have human pork. Shit. That's my shit. Shit. What should I order though? They just gave me two sticks to eat with. I didn't want to offend anyone, mostly 'cause I felt like they were watching me, so I just used them to stab up my food. Shit. 4.20/10, would not recommend.

3D Movie: Interstellar

Never before have I seen such new-fangled technologies. Precisely the bee's knees. But the seats were much too uncomfortable for my osteoporosis-ridden behind. And this tall African American fellow was sitting in front of me rudely obstructing my view. Frankly, the volume wasn't high enough either; I could barely hear anything. And it was cold. Who ever heard of a cold movie theater? How come you never visit anymore?

I felt like I could reach out and touch everything, and I didn't even have my glasses on! And oh man, let me tell you, the popcorn was great. It had just the right amount of butter. It smelt like that time I touched a cactus and heard colors. I got Snow-caps, Skittles, M&Ms, Sour Patch Kids, Sour Patch Watermelon, Sour Patch Blue Raspberry, Sour Patch Peach, Sour Patch Cherry, Sour Patch Sour Apple, Red Vines, an ICEE, Milk Duds, Mike N Ikes, and a soft pretzel too! 4.20/5, would recommend.

The Mona Lisa

This is the Mona Lisa?!? Muriel and I took a trip to France to see this?!? With my osteoporosis and her weak knees, it's hard enough to wait an hour in any line. But then we wait in this long line to come and see this tiny painting behind rows of people, who are all holding their cameras up to take pictures? Because I can't see it otherwise, I take out the Canon digital camera that my son got me a few years ago to take a picture, and what do you know, the flash makes a glare off the bulletproof glass guarding the damn painting! If I ran this place, I'd first of all remove the glass for a few hours everyday so that people can actually take pictures of the thing. But then these damn kids would probably touch the painting, making it all gross and oily. Either way, I can now say with confidence that I truly hate foreigners.

It's crazy dude, it's like she's smiling but not at the same time. Like I'd tell her to make up her mind but it seems like she already did, that's crazy! Also, her skin's so smooth, it's like I can feel my fingers running across her cheek. But at the same time I can't because it's sealed behind this dope piece of glass. I bet dudes all the time try to come up and touch her face that they had to put something in front of it. Shit's probably like 400 years old, imagine what all those fingers touching the painting would do to it. Then I wouldn't want to touch her face, it would probably be gross and oily. 4.20/420 would recommend.
