

Rams Coach Jeff Fisher On Michael Sam's Release: "This Isn't A Race Thing"

Michael Sam looking on from the sidelines in disappointment.

Following the St. Louis Rams' release of defensive end Michael Sam, head coach Jeff Fisher has qualified to the press that in light of criticism, his release was not a result of his race. Regardless, there are still concerns about the true reason Michael Sam was cut.

"Ultimately it came down to the fact that we had better men suited to the team dynamic. We had a tight roster and Michael just couldn't squeeze in," Fisher added. "The rest of the team didn't feel as comfortable with him, but I assure you it wasn't because of his ethnicity."

"He wasn't a great fit, you know?" veteran defensive captain James Laurinaitis added. "We needed a tight end, but he wanted to play a bunch of different roles. He was having fun out there, but he just wasn't playing for the right team." Laurinaitis added that he was totally cool with black people, and that Sam's race was not a factor in his feelings.

Tavon Austin, Rams' wide receiver, had a different view on the situation. "I just always felt like Michael was singled out for some reason. Maybe because he was a black man on a football team, he felt alone. I can't even imagine what that's like." Apparently, the tension went so far that the rest of the team did not feel comfortable showering with Sam, making him shower separately.

Since his release, Sam has been signed to the Dallas Cowboys's practice squad, filling an opening in their roster. As of press time Michael Sam is finding the transition easy. As much tension as St. Louis may have harbored, Dallas seems to have none for men like Sam.

Grammar-Conscious Freshman Rents a Bear From Bears Bikes

Bears Bikes, a popular student-run business on campus, reportedly rented its first bear to freshman Jordie Howell in a surprising turn of events from its usual business transactions.

"When my bike got stolen, I realized I needed a more tenable solution. One day, I was walking past Bears Bikes on the South 40, and I noticed that there was no apostrophe signifying the possessive tense in the word "Bears." And that's when it hit me. BEARS...BIKES! They rent out both bikes and bears!" gloated Howell as he tossed his brand new rental bear a rabbit's corpse for a quick snack.

Child Education Major, Fraternity Member Has Trouble Qualifying Statements

"I love shopping at Gap Kids...no pedo."

Tate Daniels, who is hoping to pursue a career in early child development, has been having trouble communicating his sentiments with his normal fraternity jargon. Although it is common place for a brother to follow his display of fraternal love with the qualifier "no homo," the practice translates poorly to the love of children, as the phrase "no pedo" is less acceptable.

While hanging out with his housemates, Tate started talking about his major, commenting, "I really love working with kids," quickly adding, "No pedo though." Unfortunately, he took the shocked looks of his brothers as interest in his studies. "It was amazing to get such a rise out of the guys. Usually no one pays attention to what I'm saying, but they much have been just as interested in children as I am, no pedo."

While Tate was motivated redouble his efforts in school, his friends, concerned about his enthusiasm and word choice, decided to contact nationals. An official statement from the Local Branch Outreach Chair of nationals read, "As someone who specializes in helping boys become men, I really sympathize with Tate. Some people just don't understand the nuances of being an older man working with people in another age bracket, no pedo."

As of press time Tate has been taken into police custody after stating he was looking forward to seeing children develop and wanted to be a part of the hands-on experiences that make them grow, but failing to specify his intentions as non-pedophilic.

All Dick Cops Really Just One Guy

In a bombshell report, WUnderground investigators can confirm that in fact, all dick cops are actually just the same guy. Responsible for giving your improperly parked bike a ticket, pulling you over for speeding, and taking your fake ID is Deputy Steve Cambridge. Cambridge, despite his reputation, is a dedicated police officer: so dedicated that he works on multiple police forces and rarely takes days off, which his colleagues attribute to his actions.

University City Police Officer Dan Marone said of Cambridge, "Think of the stereotypical asshole cop. Mustache? Moderately overweight? Always riding around on that stupid bicycle with a whistle in his mouth? That's actually him."

Fellow officers have been getting annoyed at Cambridge for perpetuating the negative stereotype of cops. It seems as though Cambridge is coincidentally always there to negate an act of public duty by any other police officer.

"It's frustrating," said St. Louis City Officer Brett Burnley. "It's like he always shows up to our missions and fucks it up. Once, I was busy a blocking off a street for peaceful protest and the next thing I know, there's Cambridge spraying pepper spray all over a bunch of students. Out of all the people protesting he HAD to pick the students. Goddamnit Cambridge."

uglier in broad daylight. But bike rentals began to decrease when problems with bike theft, crowded walkways, and a lackluster party scene made biking significantly less appealing.

"I really love my new bear. It's fun and easy to ride, and it gets me to class quicker than any bike I've ever had. I don't even need to lock it up since no idiot would ever try to steal a monstrous grizzly!"

Current owner Zackary Brewer notes that in the past, the store's supply of bears have been vastly underused, while their overpriced, low-quality bikes have had a surprisingly high demand.

"We were even thinking about cutting back on our supply of bears, because it's really expensive to support their lifestyle. But this freshman class is surprisingly attentive to meaningless details that only internet forum trolls with no social lives would care about, so there's been an increased demand. Here at Bears Bikes, we're happy to accommodate that demand!" proclaimed Brewer.

As of press time the success of Bear rentals has led to sweeping abolition of apostrophes. The cafeteria is slated to become a hangout for burly gay men, and the previous late-nite food/alternative to having a social life location will now be selling constellations. Additionally, projected interest in Wash U's sports teams is expected to soar with the coming prospect of seeing Fontbonne be mauled by bears.

WNBA President Encouraging Players To Do Something Worthy of Sportscenter's Time

As other more popular sports stories have been shutting out the WNBA from exposure on ESPN's Sportscenter, the league's President, Laurel Richie, is encouraging players to do something worthy of the popular show's time. The young, eighteen-year-old league has consistently had to deal with a lack of publicity, but during it's Championship, it is still getting less coverage than football players' domestic violence charges.

"Yeah it's been tough but I think we're capable of getting some airtime on Sportscenter. We just need to start acting like other sports," Richie added. "For example, we're just like the NBA. We play professional basketball, they play professional basketball. But, off the court, we go to church, eat Fro-Yo, and work out. NBA players smoke weed, tote guns, and drive drunk. Clearly, they're doing something right."

Though controversial, Richie has begun an initiative rewarding players for acting scandalously. Per insider documents, the league plans on rewarding acts like on-court nipple slips, punching another player, and working nights at a strip club.

"Yeah Britney Griner can dunk, but that's not sexy," defended Richie. "The game is changing. It's not what you do on the court, it's what you do in real life. But instead of real life, we should be living the thug life. Adapt or die." As of press time, the Phoenix

Mercury have won the WNBA Championship.

Point

I can't figure my roommate out at all

by Chet Kramer

I don't know why everything has to be so cryptic with my roommate. One night we go out together and everything is cool. First we pre-game in the room and then we head to the row. So, we pretty much spend the whole night together. The next night he says he has to do homework and can't drink with me. What's up with the mixed messages man?! So I brought a girl back and made sure he heard us hook-up. That will show him to ignore me. Oh, and the bathroom situation. I swear he switches the direction of the toilet paper every time. Just choose over or under and stick with it. Maybe he's trying to tell me something.

Counter-Point

Everything seems to be going alright

by Josh Werner

Yeah, I didn't drink at all in high school. So, I was a little wary coming to college, but my roommate has been really cool. He always makes sure I'm invited when he goes out and I've even taken him up a couple times and he spent the whole night with me. I mean, this is a cool guy we're talking about too, I even heard him hooking up with a girl the other night. Yup, everything has been going great. The bathroom situation has been fine too. I try to keep the toilet paper stocked so he knows I'm a responsible guy.

Hopeful Freshman Trims Pubic Hair For First Time

Doing it in the shower makes it easier to clean up afterwards.

According to his friends and suitemates, with whom he shares a bathroom, freshman Jimmy Gardner trimmed his pubic hair for the first time ever in preparation for a date at Pi Pizzeria. Apparently, he had never ever, in his eighteen years, nine months, and thirteen days on this planet, once shaved his pubic hair. "I was talking to the guys about my plans with a girl this Friday, and they started giving me all sorts of advice. When it came out that I had never attended to my area, they were all really surprised and disgusted," Gardner explained. "I posted in the floor group for scissors right away."

After an intense 54 minute battle with his plentiful mane, Gardner retired to his bed, where he immediately passed out from exhaustion. "I walked into the stall in our joint bathroom, and it looked like someone had just given my Maltese puppy a haircut," said suitemate Andrew Griffin. "Then I found Jimmy passed out in his room, and I immediately knew what had happened.

"I had no idea what a necessity it was," said Gardner after being awoken from his three-hour nap. "I just hope the maid comes soon to clean up the bathroom."

Unfortunately, Gardner missed his date due to the nap he took following the conclusion of the trimming. Yet, Gardner still had an optimistic perspective on the whole situation.

"Yeah it's alright, because I met her on Tinder, and my Tinder pictures look completely different now," said Gardner as he smirked.

law enforcement, police officers that work with Cambridge feel as though they've been the ones unfairly profiled because of him.

"I tried to help an old lady cross the street the other day," recalled Clayton Officer Scott Berman. "She drove her cane right into my nuts and said 'That's for that damn parking ticket.' I didn't even get a chance."

However, Berman qualified the more heinous actions of police officers.

"Oh yeah, and then there's the guy who pulls over minorities, finds marijuana, drags them out of the car and beats the living shit out of them, inciting race riots all over the country. That's Bob."
