

Career Center Finally Helps First Student Find Job

In an unprecedented turn of events, the Washington University Career Center announced that it has finally helped a graduating senior land a job. The announcement came in the form of a 3:00 am Record email, in which Career Center Director Mark Smith was quoted saying, "We're pleased to announce that senior Matt Richardson has received and accepted a formal job offer. With our help, the Biomedical Engineering and Economics Major, who is also receiving a minor in Applied Statistics and speaks fluent Mandarin, was able to find a position working at the front desk, right here at the Career Center."

According to industry experts, the coveted front desk position opened up last month when the previous receptionist took maternity leave. Thanks to the Career Center's vast network of connections and wealth of insider knowledge, Richardson was able to get a leg up on the competition.

"The best way to prepare for the interview is with practice and role-playing," explained Christy Vaeth, Richardson's personal Career Center advisor. "I helped Matt prepare for the interview by telling him, 'Okay, now pretend I'm with the Career Center and I'm interviewing you.' The practice clearly paid off when I interviewed him the following week."

Yet despite the recent success, many students remain pessimistic. "We're all screwed," lamented junior Clayton Wachter as he finished shotgunning a can of Natty. "I actually went inside the Career Center once to take a piss, so I've seen the place firsthand, and while I was there I heard them tell a kid he needed to take initiative and create a resume for himself before they could help him. Create your own resume? Who has time for that? They might as well rename the place the 'Fuck it, I'll go to grad school' Center."

Answering the phone is one of Richardson's many important responsibilities at his prestigious new job

Now that he is on the staff, Richardson hopes to continue the Career Center's run of success by helping himself find a second job so that he can pay off his student loan debts and still eat enough food to survive.

Student Comes Out GOP

In light of high unemployment, a tax system in disarray, and widespread financial instability, senior Jake Jacobs has come out of the closet to profess his allegiance to the GOP.

"I've always felt a little different from my peers," Jacobs admitted. "I remember when I was ten years old watching Jonathan Robson climb the rope in gym class. Everybody else was cheering him on, but as I stared at the graceful motion of his warrior-like arms and rock hard buttocks, a strange and tingly sensation came over me. Although I didn't fully realize it at the time, I knew then that the cheers of our classmates were useless. Only through individual agency and perseverance would he ever reach the top."

Like many of his Republican peers, Jacobs says that coming out to his parents was especially difficult. "At first my dad didn't take it too well," Jacobs explained. "He called me an embarrassment and an abomination, and he said that if he and Mom had known I'd turn out this messed up, they would have had that twentieth abortion. They're just too liberal to understand."

Jacobs' confession has come as a quite a surprise to many in the WashU community who remember him for his charitable dedication to Habitat for Humanity, his tolerant and caring nature, and for not being a total dumbass.

"Am I shocked? Damn straight, I'm shocked," explained Jacobs' close friend Max Wilkins. "I mean, I guess I should have suspected something when he started eating grits, reading the Bible, and listening to country music. And then there was the time I offered to pay for his share of the cab and his eyes got wide, his pupils were kind of shaky, and he yelled something like 'I don't need your lousy wealth transfers, you misguided communist pig! Or some shit like that. But, yeah, otherwise I thought he was a straight-shooter.'"

University psychologist Phyllis Jones has offered her explanation for this phenomenon. "It's not uncommon for these young, closet-Republicans to spend long periods of time in denial," she said. "We often see them joining liberal-minded student groups and even bullying other Republicans in an effort to fit in with their peers. But it's as if a demon persists within them, whispering the seductive song of the GOP and pulling them away from progressive, enlightened politics."

The decision to come out GOP also has significant implications for students' social lives. "Yeah, I'm not hanging out with Jacobs anymore," admitted former friend Dylan Parker. "I don't care if you're black, white, gay, straight, Hindu, Buddhist, skinny, or fat. Hell, you could even be an Islamic extremist and I'd be willing to attribute our differences to my own cultural ignorance and sing Kumbaya. But Republicans can go fuck themselves."

Given such animosity toward conservative students, many fear an increase in campus violence as the number of openly Republican students continues to grow. When asked what efforts WashU might be planning to protect the welfare of these GOP students, WUPD police chief Dom Strom stated, "Hey, I'm a blue collar guy with two kids at home. A little bit of guerilla warfare on campus never hurt nobody—especially if it helps keep Obama in office. Plus, the union protects me against these shenanigans, and I think the government will still pay me me if I take the next couple weeks off."

Art Student Tries to Not Take His Work Too Seriously

To prepare for his second semester as a painting major, junior Silas Maddox felt he needed to "take the pressure off" and simply enjoy what he loves to do. The painting studios at Wash U often produce high-strung students who get so caught up attempting to master the conceptual form that they start to lose their grip on reality. Maddox, however, differentiates himself by not taking things too seriously.

"I'm really just going with the flow, you know?" he said while giving a tour of his workspace to confused pre-frosches. "I mean, just look at that flow. See how the blue just surrenders itself to the orange as my brush caresses the canvas? That's the kind of process that can't be duplicated. Am I right?!"

"I used to be like all the elitist theorists around here, searching for some kind of universal system of truth in the avante-garde within their materials," he added. "Isn't that the most ridiculous thing you've ever heard? I've totally turned around and gone all post-postmodernist since then. It's just my super chilled out way of uncovering the true meaning of life and human existence and shit. Sort of a small gift to the world. That's just how Silas P. Maddox gets it done."

"Whoops, made a bad mark there, see? It's no biggie! I can just throw it out and start again whenever I want to, no problem whatsoever," he added while asking us to step back in order to avoid interrupting the wavelengths in his creative airspace.

Despite Maddox's outlook, sources within the art school admit that the student has struggled to perform at the level expected of him. "Silas has yet to master the craft," explained art professor Emilia Jones-Murray. "His pseudo intellectual approach falls well short of the brilliance of, say, my courageous painting of a man's head on an owl's body superimposed over a series of cubes that challenges the status-quo and disrupts the boundaries of time and space itself. No, Silas's work teeters dangerously close to the mundane. That's why he got a C+."

Nevertheless, Maddox refuses to be deterred by his poor grades.

"I wear these glasses to look chill. Oh and also to avoid being blinded by the brilliance of my art." says art student Silas Maddox

"Whatever man, I'm just rolling with it," he explained. "Monet's paintings were unappreciated during his lifetime too. Someday, maybe after my death, my art will be hanging up in the Louvre. And I'll be there to see it, because my soul is immortal and transcendent, and wherever there is art, there is Silas P. Maddox. But yeah - if not, that's cool too."

Chancellor Wrighton Relieved of Duties After Allegations of Glow Stick Fraud Surface

The Washington University Board of Directors announced today that it has unanimously voted to relieve Mark S. Wrighton of his duties as Chancellor. The announcement comes after allegations surfaced that the former Chancellor lied about inventing the glow stick on his resume.

"I am extremely disappointed by these recent findings," said Board Chairman Stephen F. Brauer. "During Mr. Wrighton's tenure, the university has seen the annual number of freshman applicants double. And while the former Chancellor revamped the curriculum, oversaw the construction of over thirty new buildings, and added more than 190 endowed professorships, it is clear that the tremendous rise in the university's reputation is due to the fact that everybody thought he had created the glow stick. That's why we make sure to mention it every year at Convocation."

"The glow stick is almost certainly the greatest invention of the modern era," added physics professor Alan Steinberg. "What other device can function so effectively as both a source of illumination and a party favor? I came here because that was the type of cutting-edge research I wanted to get involved with."

When confronted about the allegations, a visibly shaken Wrighton confessed to the lie. "I remember looking around the waiting room and seeing all the other candidates for the position," he explained. "There was the CEO of Anheuser-Busch, the Former Missouri governor Bob Holden, and even actor Will Smith. How was I supposed to compete with the Fresh Prince of Bel-Air? I was still rolling-face from

Wrighton addressing the school following allegations of Glow Stick fraud

Day Glow the night before, and I just had the idea to lie about inventing glow sticks. I'm deeply, deeply sorry."

The university has already announced a highly qualified list of replacement candidates, including the creator of Tamagatchi, the inventor of Snap Bracelets, and the genius behind the Chia Pet.

Professional Wrestling Marred by Replacement Referees

The ongoing strike by International Wrestling Federation referees has forced the league to hire replacement officials, but some believe that the new officials are unprepared for the frantic pace of the sport.

Many wrestlers have already come forward to complain about the referees. "These scabs are terrible!" said former World Champion Enrique Calzone. "Just last week, my friend Tyron the Tornado was knocked out by the dastardly Jacques Soufflé, who hit Tyron with brass knuckles while the referee was distracted by [Soufflé's girlfriend] Mandy, who was doing a sexy dance. I know how sexy Mandy can be, since she used to be my girl. But this can't go on!"

"You hear me, Soufflé?" Calzone shouted. "I'm coming for you, Frenchy!"

Not all wrestlers have been so critical of the replacements, however. Grandpa Sam, a forty-year veteran of the IWF, feels that the officials are doing a fine job. "Back in my day," Grandpa Sam crowed, "tacks and barbed wire were legal. These pampered whippersnappers wouldn't have stood a chance against Vengeful Vinny or even his wife, Voluptuous Veronica!"

Negotiations between the normal referees and the owners have been at a standstill for months, with the referees demanding compensation for injuries caused by flying chairs. Still, an end to the strike may be in sight, as IWF Chairman Rick Striker is reportedly set to meet head referee Bobby "Countin'" Tucker in an arbitration cage match later this month.

POINT

I love being a WUSA

by Kelly Schumacher,

I luuuuv being a WUSA! It's so great getting to be a role model for these kiddos. I'm totally not just doing this cause it looks good on my resume or anything. I know that the floor really looks up to me, and I'm just doing everything I can to make sure they all have the funnest year like ever! I really feel like they can come to me if they have problems or whatevs—I just want to be like a big sister to them. I'm soooo lucky that I got the bestest freshman floor ever! Mwah I love you Ruby 2!

COUNTER-POINT

My WUSA Kelly is a useless bitch

by Sean Kramer,
Ruby 2 resident

Contrary to your enthusiastic assertion, the reality is that you have proven to be about as useful to me as a tampon. Swinging by our common room once a month for fifteen minutes to drop off over-cooked brownies does not constitute mentorship. I mean, they didn't even have pot in them! Well-intentioned though you may be, it is clear that we will never develop a meaningful relationship, and I find the prospect of running into you around campus and having to awkwardly force a smile for the next 3 years to be especially dreadful. Also, my name is Sean, not Sam, you dumb bitch.

Freshman's Sex Life Not Living Up to Expectations

Six weeks into his college career, Freshman Matt Blake's sex life has failed to live up to his expectations. Despite the popular media's depiction of college as a time for wild parties and unrestrained sexual deviance, Blake says that his experience has been overwhelmingly disappointing.

"Where are the tits?" a distraught Blake asked while flipping through flash cards depicting various molecular structures. "My first day here I stocked up on a bunch of those free res-life condoms, but the only time I've ever used one was to masturbate when I'd run out of tissues."

Like other sexually desperate freshman males, Blake has been going above and beyond normal male behavior to try and boost his sex appeal. According to his roommates, Blake has been spotted vacuuming, washing his sheets, and flossing. "I even started using conditioner!" he added.

"I've had four different girls over to watch tv with me. I even paid for an Ibbey's dinner with my meal points and then watched The Notebook with this one chick!" Blake lamented. "Each time the excuse was the same: 'Sorry, my roommate needs help with something, I'll see you tomorrow.' Fuck that and fuck her—we both know that I won't."

Fortunately for Blake, there is some hope. As Newton's 4th law states, one girl in every class will achieve infamy for being that one chick who gets plowed harder than a Chinese rice field. And Mandy Gilligan, this year's super slut, says she is willing to put out. "I'll get to Blake eventually, he just needs to get in line and take a deli number before he can get a slice of these roast beef curtains," she explained.

Until then, Blake says he'll just have to explore other aspects of the college experience Wash U might have to offer, like going to wild football tailgates or sneaking into sorority houses.

Freshman entertains himself with a condom he knows he won't use that night anyway.

Top 10...

Crime Prevention Tips

10. Most people fall into a life of crime because they had a poor education. Ask suspicious persons what Atticus Finch represents about the American spirit.
9. Never leave your room.
8. Try to avoid displays of wealth, like wearing flashy jewelry and attending a school that costs more than the US median household income.
7. Explain to the mugger that your phone is only an iPhone 4S, so it's a worthless piece of crap right now.
6. Remember that your money isn't worth your life. Then forget it and work a miserable job for the next fifty years.
5. If you are accosted by a mugger, run to the nearest blue light phone. It will ensure that your body is easy to find.
4. If Omar comin', y'all best just drop the stash.
3. Don't commit crimes.
2. In most cases of sexual assault, the victim knows the attacker, so don't make any friends.
1. Throw a party; the police will show up immediately

WUnderground's Take on the iPhone 5

Pros

- Bigger screen so you can watch movies the way they were meant to be watched—on an iPhone
- New A6 Chip for faster performance and better in-class gaming
- Oleophobic non-stick coating screen for your masturbatory convenience
- LTE Chip so you can browse the web in Bear's Den instead of standing around awkwardly
- Louder speakers so you don't have to put your phone in a bowl

Cons

- FaceTime HD camera so your parents can see that nice new hickey you got last night
- New Retina display with integrated touch technology makes replacing the screen harder, so frat carefully
- Improved Battery life so you can stare at your phone longer waiting for that hot guy from class to text you back
- Improved Siri secretary functionality but still no sexy secretary
- New Lightning Connector so you have to buy a new adaptor for each of your booty calls' bedrooms
