

Student Life Files Lost and Found Report for Second Half of Website Title

Not to mention the missing Oxford commas!

On Tuesday, Student Life, WashU's independent, student-run "newspaper," filed a lost and found report with WUPD after misplacing the second half of its website title. As the top search result for "studlife" is a page entitled "StudLife's" (shown above), WUunderground staff initially assumed that this was one of the publication's signature typos and was meant to read "StudLives." However, after interviewing over 100 students, staff writers finally spoke with a student who occasionally reads the paper and revealed the shocking truth: the confusing search result usually reads "StudLife's Website." This student asked to remain anonymous under fear of "living out my next three years as a pariah and potentially having to transfer."

While the document that Student Life filed with WUPD was technically a "Lost Item Entry," sources within the organization have reported that this move was largely political. According to a nameless informant writing from the email address "studlifeseecretes@gmail.com," in reality "the preveiling [sic] hipohthesis [sic] is that this really was actually a case of larsony [sic]." After poring through decades of StudLife archives, WUunderground analysts interpreted this poorly spelled and structured message to mean that StudLife staff believe the website title was stolen. It remains a mystery what exactly it is that StudLife secretes, but we have a few ideas.

The email goes on to explain that in recent years, Student Life has received threatening messages from The Record, another campus publication which overtook the student-run outfit in readership several years ago. The Record is famously shrouded in mystery— who its publishers are, why they are always up so late, and how they got all of our email addresses are subjects of widespread speculation. These details combine to explain StudLife's astounding conspiracy theory: that hackers from The Record infiltrated the website and replaced its original explanatory name with a confusing moniker to reduce traffic to the page.

If this diabolical plot really exists, it has certainly been effective. Daily visits to the StudLife site have reportedly been cut in half over the past week, dipping well below five. Meanwhile, visits to Uncle Joe's have increased due to distressed students that have been set adrift without the publication's invaluable guidance on which bread to pick at Subway, what songs to play during sex, and why they should hate fraternities. Studs all over campus are holding out hope that the website will be easily identifiable again in time for the paper's classic "WILD Bingo." Tori Arneson, a junior, is especially eager: "That's my favorite StudLife moment every semester, when they release the [WILD] bingo card. It gets me so excited for the concert, during which I will definitely be playing a StudLife bingo game!"

Fraternity Gives Free Alcohol to Students in Need

Most of the members of Sigma Chi joined for one thing and one thing only: philanthropy. The brothers are truly committed to making the world a better place through their good deeds.

"It's like I've always said," explained Carson McDaniels, a current pledge of the fraternity. "It's more about what you give than what you receive, bruh." To put this mantra into action, the brothers of Sigma Chi (popularly known as "Macho") recently spent the weekend distributing alcoholic beverages to needy students — students who may not have had a drink in one, possibly even two weeks.

"I've heard horror stories of students who have gone entire semesters without getting so drunk that they pee on public artwork and puke in their friends' gaping mouths," said McDaniels. "It really makes you think about how lucky you are."

Many of these students don't even have the resources to get tipsy without the help of a local frat. A recent Pew study found that only 24.7 percent of WashU students have fake IDs, well below the national average.

Cornell McFlannels, another brother, adopted more politically charged rhetoric: "This is about serving the disenfranchised. It's about helping the marginalized populations of the world who haven't had a voice because they've been too sober to belligerently yell at complete strangers. We want those who have been dealt a shit hand to get shit faced!"

"I am woouoooooouoke," screamed McDaniels, now completely nude, covered with doodled penises from head to toe, standing on the roof of the frat-house.

Macho says it has distributed over 100 gallons of jungle juice to needy students this month alone, making it the most productive charitable organization on campus. Other fraternities are following its lead, joining in the giving spirit. The brothers of Sigma Nu ("Smoo" for short) are promoting safe sex, distributing condoms to girls who show a willingness to sleep with them. ZBT has now issued "bumps" of cocaine to over twenty "chill dudes." And the brothers of AEPi, in a display of great charity and fraternal spirit, have offered to pay for each other's legal counsel.

"Especially in light of recent events, we acknowledge that fraternity culture isn't perfect," admits McFlannels. "We hope our philanthropic work will assure the community of our continued commitment to the betterment of mankind."

Daniel Day-Lewis Reveals Not a Talented Actor, Only Method Acting as One

The conversation about this Sunday's Academy Awards ceremony was flooded with drama this week when Best Actor nominee Daniel Day-Lewis revealed that he never was a talented actor at all, but has rather been method-acting as one this whole time. Known for his intense commitment to roles, the Lincoln star will often live as a character for months at a time. This past Sunday, a week before the 90th Oscars, Daniel Day-Lewis unzipped his skin during an interview to reveal an identical, slightly less talented Daniel Day-Lewis.

"I would like to express my deepest regret that I've lied for so long," said Day-Lewis. "But I'm having trouble conveying the depth of this sentiment because I can no longer act as well." The three-time Best Actor recipient then launched into a horrible Abraham Lincoln impression while simultaneously misquoting There Will Be Blood, another of his award-winning films. Day-Lewis revealed in the interview that the past 40 years have been in preparation for an upcoming Daniel Day-Lewis biopic based on his life, in which he will portray the exponentially more talented version of himself, who has decades of formal training and acting experience behind him. However, Day-Lewis's announcement regarding his lack of talent has already spurred talks of a re-cast, especially speculation about Mark Ruffalo filling the role.

"Actually, my nocturnal evil twin is a much more talented actor," added Day-Lewis. "Look him up on IMDB: Daniel Night-Lewis. He's my stunt double for scenes that take place at night. Sure, he's evil, but he was a really big help on the set of The Age of Innocence when the night scenes were particularly hard on my moon allergy."

Daniel Night-Lewis should not be confused with Daniel Knight-Lewis, a Game of Thrones extra who is the third-eldest brother in the family, nor Daniel Kite-Lewis, who shares no relation, but can fly a mean kite. Day-Lewis, Night-Lewis, and Knight-Lewis credit their friendly homosexual dog, Spaniel Gay-Lewis, for their extended thespian success. Other inspirations of theirs include Midwestern Christian patron Daniel Saint-Louis, who reportedly guided them through a strictly religious childhood.

With the implication that Day-Lewis will retire from cinema following this revelation, many have wondered if he would pursue theatre in his retirement. However, Day-Lewis has insisted that he would not want to take attention away from up-and-coming Broadway performer Daniel Play-Lewis.

Rather than going to the post-Oscar party, the Day-Lewis acting troupe has decided that they will hold a family reunion, henceforth to be known as "Day-Lewis Day." Day-Lewis was unavailable for comment about this decision, as he was preoccupied working as an administrator at a travel insurance company, which has been his actual career for nearly four decades.

Student Wins HQ, Tells Orgo Professor to Shove It

It was a Thursday evening, and a sophomore student (who will be referred to only as "Jack") was gathered in his common room with five students of different majors and a sixth who just knows a lot of random bullshit. The situation seemed poised for something great to happen. As the clock approached 8pm, the energy in the room was nearing explosive.

"It was a big moment," Jack recalled following his victory. "The stars were aligned and the omens were auspicious. My uncle won the Powerball, but before the Missouri Lottery could give him a new identity, he was murdered. I've been playing HQ in the hope of living out his forgotten legacy."

Jack recounted the fateful game. "Yeah, so first three [questions] were super easy. One plus one kinda stuff. My B-School friend was in his element. Then there were three questions about the Kardashians, cause, y'know, and this kid that watches the show out of 'cultural interest' got them," he laughed. "We got to question 12, and I don't even know what came over me, but I decided to sabotage everyone who had helped me. Maybe it's a premed thing. Anyway, the question was about Bucky Balls, and I told everyone the wrong answer and chose the right one and won."

When Jack (who wishes to remain anonymous due to the threat posed by all the rich WashU kids who might want to steal his newfound fortune,) had finished fist-pumping, masturbating in front of his friends while wearing a bald cap and red goatee, and streaking down the hallway, he considered the great fortune that had befallen him. "So many doors opened for me after that moola hit my PayPal account, you know? I knew I was going to drop out, but there was one thing I knew I had to do first."

The next day Jack walked into Organic Chemistry lab blasting "My Neck, My Back" on his Beats Pill, and, middle finger raised, told his professor to do a series of unsavory acts, here abridged to "Shove it." He then tore off his lab coat to reveal that he was once again nude and sprinted out of class screaming "I've finally done it! I've fucked bitches AND gotten money!" Shortly following this incident and the release of the prior statement, the subject legally changed his name and divided his winnings, estimated at $6, between banks in Panama and the Cayman Islands. His current whereabouts are unknown.

"Jack" accepting his HQ winnings. He has not been seen since, although several dubious reports have surfaced of a lookalike smuggling a valise through Monaco.

Student Eco-Terrorist Group Leaving Unflushed Pee All Over Campus

A radical fringe group widely believed to be backed by the Office of Sustainability has unleashed its most brutal campaign to date, leaving urine unflushed in men's, women's, and gender-neutral bathrooms all over campus. The practice, referred to as "Yellow Urinalism," has been jointly condemned by the Student Health Services and the Office of the Chancellor, yet has taken off in recent weeks.

A spokesperson for the group, known only by the alias "George P.P. Martin," said in a statement that "If this practice were adopted by the student body and endorsed by the administration, the University would save millions of gallons of water per year, which is both in its financial interest and kind to Mother Earth." The contemptible eco-terrorist went on to claim that leveraging this "green practice" and mentioning it on tours would actually attract more applicants to the school.

The group, formally known as Green Faction, was stripped of its SU status and budget allocation two years ago after a campaign to increase bike use on campus infamously led to the deaths of three students who were looking at their phones and walking on the left side of the path during passing times. While ostensibly disbanded, the group continued operating underground, covertly recruiting at various campus events, particularly the Office of Sustainability's annual Harvest Festival. Because of Sustainability's failure to crack down on this subversive activity, it is generally believed that it radicalized and converted Green Faction into a proxy group following its expulsion from SU.

Green Faction first resurfaced in fall of 2017, making waves when it bought out all of the red Solo® cups at Schnuck's and replaced them with recyclable cups that the Interfraternity Council formally denounced as "super lame" in a statement. In early February, a proclamation posted on the door of BD and entitled "95 Pee-Pees" foreshadowed the most recent wave of eco-terrorist aggression. The revulsion over having to pee into somebody else's pee has already spawned several reactionary groups, one of which advocates flushing the toilet twice after peeing, "just to make sure all of the pee really gets washed down." Less radical is the common concern that if Green Faction is not reined in before Spring WILD, Boxed Water may take an even more insidious shape. Students all over campus are hoping it doesn't come to that point.

Joe Biden Endorses "Armed Teachers" Proposal

"I firmly believe in arming all of our citizens: teachers, artists, veterinarians, youth pastors...everybody, regardless of circumstance, should be granted access to at least two arms," Biden declared, before realizing his mistake and rescinding the statement.

In response to the recent Parkland shooting, President Trump last week proposed a new strategy of arming teachers. His statement, unsurprisingly, has been met with much controversy, but smatterings of support have come from some surprising places.

In order to gather a diversity of opinions on the matter, the WUnderground staff interviewed a number of prominent political figures. We had the opportunity to ask former Vice President Joe Biden for his thoughts on Trump's idea.

"I think this is the best idea President Trump has had so far!" Biden exclaimed enthusiastically. "Giving robotic arms to paraplegic teachers is vital to ensure that they can achieve their maximum potential in the classroom."

Biden went on to tell a poignant anecdote about his second grade teacher who lost both arms in a gruesome knitting accident, and how she struggled leading the class in games of Duck, Duck, Goose.

"Our teachers are this nation's backbone, and we have a responsibility to help them teach children proper scissor techniques and how to correctly hold a pencil."

When informed that Trump probably wanted to give actual weapons to teachers to prevent future mass shootings, Biden chuckled.

"Oh, Donnie, Listen, I don't like his politics, but people don't give him enough credit. He's a funny guy!"

Actually though, I'm for sure not in S7ven. I mean, if I were, I wouldn't be able to tell you, but that's a moot point, because I'm totally not even a little bit in S7ven. If you think I've been sneaking around a lot lately, you're probably just reading too far into it.

WUnderground Presents: The Non-Sex Issue

StudLife says there's a "running joke" (prime opportunity to say gag) in their office that people only sign up for StudLife to produce the Sex Issue. That's probably true. Here at WUnderground, though, we sign up to produce the antithesis of whatever StudLife produces, so we present to you the 2018 Non-Sex Issue.
