WashU Criticized for Gentrification of Culturally Vibrant Hole

THE HOLE-

WashU has recently come under fire for gentrifying the "East End," a culturally vibrant hole with a storied history of being big.

Many residents of the hole have been priced out of the neighborhood and forced to relocate. Critics are castigating WashU for displacing hundreds of dirt particles, part-time construction workers, and big trucks that go "ERR-ERRRRR EEEEEEE" in the morning.

In their place, WashU has erected the Craig and Nancy Schnucks Pavilion, a cafeteria which serves upscale foods like an avocado salmon burger and a kale sandwich or some shit, and the Gary M. Summers Welcome Center, where prospective students can observe beautiful architecture through plate glass windows and cower before the magnificence of the Brookings Quadrangle.

WashU has also announced plans to introduce an Amazon Bookstore, three boutique donut shops, and an artisanal soap dispensary.

"We've been priced out of the neighborhood," remarked a sentient bulldozer, "this place just isn't the same hole where I raised my children. That hole had class. That hole had culture."

"There's enough paved pathway on this campus already. Can't they make room for just ONE desolate construction site?," Mr. Bulldozer added.

"It's an absolute disgrace," said Michael Ellis, a woke campus activist who totally buys SchPav's cold brews. "I am so very angry."

In response to such criticism, Chancellor Martin has announced plans to buy Fontbonne and demolish it with 100 tons of TNT, thereby creating a new and improved hole, even more desolate than its predecessor.

Still, some less privileged members of the WashU community are voicing concern that gentrification will not stop with the East End. Yesterday, the hair creature in the Beaumont shower drain voiced concern that "the yuppies are coming for his home next."

Art Show is Happening!

ST. LOUIS, MO -

Last month, the WashU community and surrounding area celebrated the long-anticipated opening of an Art Show at the Art Museum. The exhibition, which opened to the public on September 27th, features a variety of art including Big Art, Small Art, Art That is Also a Video, and also lots of other kinds of art too. Some of the art has paint on it, but some doesn't. The exhibition also showcases plaques with words on them.

"I've been looking forward to this exhibition for months," said Tyler Korin, a Sophomore in WashU's architecture program. "This art is especially exciting because it was done by a famous artist, which means it is better art than if it were done by a not famous artist. I think it is good art," he added, gesturing grandly at some art.

Clara Koster, a Junior studying Anthropology, echoed Korin's statement. "There is good art here," she told reporters at press time. Pointing at a big old piece of art, she added, "I particularly like this art. This is especially good art, which is why I like it." Leila Kiely, a graduate student working closely with the Art Museum, confirmed that the piece in question is, as Koster alleged, good art.

"Sometimes it's difficult to tell whether art is good or bad," explained Kiely, whose research focuses primarily on Famous Old Art by White Guys. "Sometimes you think art is good when actually it's bad, and vice versa. But I have a PhD, so I can tell which art is good and which art is bad. You can typically discern whether art is good or bad by how it looks and the way it is. This art looks good and is good, so it is good art."

When asked about the art show, Kiely responded with enthusiasm. "Yes, this is most certainly an art show," she agreed. "There's lots of art here, and furthermore it's in the Art Museum. It's good that an artist did this art! This is such an art show!"

At press time, representatives confirmed that there is an art show with art in it and, furthermore, that they plan to have another in the future. "We're delighted to show people our art so that they can look at it," announced Sasha Tolliver, Director of Outreach at the art museum, "and we look forward to having more art for people to also look at in the future."

Fila Thot Stompers

ATLANTA, GA-

Scientists at the Center for Disease Control have found startling research on the Fila Disruptors, the Thot Shoe that has seen increased popularity following Hot Girl Summer. Lead scientist Dr. Whet Faartz has discovered that wearing these specific Fila shoes leads to increased levels of aggression and violence. The shoe is known for its ability to bestow superpowers upon the wearer, such as the ability to repel those in the immediate vicinity and the power to look like a fucking nurse. Assistant scientist Dr. Dick Swett, who leads the clinical aspect of the study, has seen the shoes go by many names, including: Fila Decepticons and Big White WalkyBois. But at press time, Dr. Swett confirmed that the proper nomenclature for the shoe, the Thot Stomper, is the accepted terminology among those conducting the study and in the scientific community.

A subject of the study, Ana L., described her reasoning behind her cooperation. "I really don't like the person I am today. I've started saying tsktsktsk, I spend 14 hours a day on VSCO, and my Hydro-flask has so many stickers that it looks like a laptop case." Faartz believes that by better understanding people like Ana L., society can learn to re-assimilate these people through rehabilitative programs, over-the-counter medication, daily diaries, and, of course, confirmation that the subjects no longer possess their cursed, cursed shoes.

When asked how the public can help those affected, Drs. Faartz and Swett both agreed that staying vigilant at all times was crucial. "You never really know what's going on inside the mind of a Fila hoe," said Faartz. "We wish we could snap our fingers and turn back time before the Thot Stompers were released, but we can only strive to change the present."

Fila Thot Stomper culture is a dark stain on the world. Susceptible individuals include: fans of Rex Orange County, E-girls/boys (the weird ones), sorority girls who wear music festival glitter to frat parties, wearers of platform Tevas, people unironically wearing Kim Possible-esque pants, viewers of the HBO show Euphoria, and those who have a general lack of fashion sense. The researchers hope their study will fix the lives of these lost children and possibly warn future youth about our generation's wrongdoing. Through the power of science, society just might be able to return to normalcy.

Fila headquarters have declined to comment.

So, You're Reading WUnderground...

And you're enjoying it! This is funny, right? You appreciate our clever jokes and quirky social commentary. Our scathing and finely honed humor just hits a bit differently than that elementary bullshit your suitemates enjoy. It's elegant and polished, like a fine red wine. And you definitely drink red wine. Wafting in the aroma of your Frantzia and listening to Sufjan Stevens on vinyl, you contemplate the complexity and poignancy of that last WUnderground article you read. You're an eccentric sophisticate with a superior taste in humor. Must be nice.

After all, you've always been a fan of The Onion, well maybe not always, but at least ever since your more intellectual friend showed it to you. You often find yourself scrolling through Click- hole's Instagram page, chuckling to yourself and saying, "that's so true" after every headline, because it was indeed, so true. And finally, you discovered WUnderground, muttering, "Oh my gosh, it's just like Clickhole," and you were right, as you often are about these things, because you're the smartest person on the fucking planet.

You must be so proud of yourself, understanding every joke we make. Holy cow, you are brilliant. Last month's "Nah bro, I'm good" piece and the article about the bee-hating professor, you totally got that shit, and you would never, and I mean never, in a thousand moons, say "Nah bro, I'm good." That's so below you. You're not chicken tendies and sweats; you're caviar and slacks, dammit! You're a comedic connoisseur with a painstakingly cultivated taste in humor. This *toooooo*ally isn't a façade and you definitely won't laugh at a Barstool video later. In fact, you even have seen a standup comedy special on Netflix. Well, half of one. Still, you get humor.

Most importantly, you should feel special. After all, you get us. You see things in a deeper way and find value in our thoughtfully crafted humor. And by you, I mean every single individual reading this article. Everyone is special, in the same damn way. Regrettably, I do not have a ribbon to award you for your excellence, but nevertheless, great job! Keep it up, you!

Profile of Regina George

REGINA GEORGE... HOW DO I EVEN BEGIN TO DESCRIBE REGINA GEORGE?

Regina George is flawless

I heard she does car commercials in Kazakhstan

One time she stole liquor out of her dad's butler pantry and pawned it for 800 cases of chef Boyardee.

During gym class, she doesn't just get picked first. She sits under the bleachers and plays with her toy lizards.

When she walks through the hall, all the boys stare at her, because she's the only one that stands on two remote controlled cars to get from place to place.

One time, she met John Stamos on a plane, and he asked her if she knew what would happen if everyone in the world jumped at the same time.

I hear her favorite movie is Chef Boyardee, the commercial where the can rolls all the way home.

All the other girls spread rumors about her. Partly because they're jealous that her hair's insured for 3 1/4 yen. Partly because there's a plausible theory that she is Chef Boyardee.

Screw this, I'm getting cheese fries Beefaroni

Chancellor Martin Promotes New Solar Energy Plan

The newly inaugurated Chancellor Andrew D. Martin believes WashU can play a part in combating global warming. "These rising temperatures threaten our way of life," he said at a congratulatory dinner in which he announced his new Solar Energy Plan, "and we need to do something."

Martin continued to prophesy about climate change, grinning maniacally as a pyramid of Sunny D bottles was rolled in beside him. He quickly rubbed the tips of his fingers together as the beverages were distributed to his associates. They remained confused, even after Andrew D. Martin said he'd be putting the "D" (Sunny D) back into WashU's campus.

"As a moderately rational human being," said A. Douche, a journalist from Student Life, "I expected Chancellor's Martin's Solar Energy Plan to involve replacing the power plants with solar panels. I see now that I was wrong [and that I write pointless articles with no dick jokes]."

Article 1 of the Solar Energy Plan states that "All WashU facilities will abandon outdated and medieval methods of energy [electricity, natural gas, big dick energy, etc.] and instead use the divine source of Sunny D." Article 5 states that all beverages (including tap water) will no longer be sold or offered at WashU, and that "Sunny D will invigorate the fecund minds of WashU's students, allowing them to be effectively mobilized."

The Plan lacks discrete instructions but notes that Sunny D "is undoubtedly the best brand of orange juice," and "will allow man to prevail." Article

1,179 states that: "Sunny D will flow through WashU like the Nile River. Sidewalks will be transformed into irrigation tracts, and students will sail to class over the raging seas of Sunny D." For reasons of journalistic clarity, it is important to note that Chancellor Martin drafted this plan single-handedly. The document is mostly unintelligible.

According to his descriptive butler, Chancellor Martin was found later in a near unconscious state muttering "here comes the sun [doo-doo-doo-doo]." The walls of his office--where he collapsed on his desk-- were lined with Sunny D ads. A picture of the Chancellor's wife and children were tampered with, their faces replaced by the Sunny D logo. Empty juice bottles cluttered his cabinets, as well as where he lay.

The butler remarked--with sentimentality I did not ask from him--how a bottle in the Chancellor's outstretched hand spilled its last droplets onto the carpet. "God," he supposedly said to the butler, "God, I can't do it. I just can't fucking do it anymore."

Medical professionals have since diagnosed the episode as a case of Sunny D overdose.

Wash U to Re-Brand Philosophy Major as WGSS, But For Men

Upon heavy request, Wash U's Philosophy Department has begun the process of rebranding to WGSSBFM (Women, Gender and Sexuality Studies, But For Men). The university states that they hope this change will encourage white men to freely express their opinions at any time, whether prompted or not. "I think this will open up a lot of doors for marginalized voices in our cis-male community," Chancellor Martin told reporters. He beamed as he cut a ribbon in front of a WGSS plaque on which the W had been scratched out and replaced by an M.

Dr. Beckman (PhD), professor of Sexuality Studies

But Just For Men, stated that he had been waiting for this change his entire career. "The other day I was thinking about the Hegelian dialectic and I realized, suddenly, that I was a valuable ally for marginalized people such as women," he declared while adjusting his toupee. At press time, reporters found Dr. Beckman still talking, unaware that they had ever left.

"Now I can finally major in something I actually care about," declared Chad, WGSS-BFM major and SAE diversity outreach coordinator. Without being asked and to no one in particular, Chad continued to say, "Also, did you know that men and women don't get paid the same amount? That's whack." It should be noted that Chad proceeded to remove his beige cable-knit sweater to reveal an identical, slightly smaller beige cable-knit sweater.

"I'm proud of the bold strides our university is taking to ensure that students, especially cis-male coastal elites, feel heard," Chancellor Martin reiterated. The first WGSSBFM professor was unveiled Monday to be a giant (uncircumcised) talking penis.

Tensions Soar after Alpha Phi Bans Chewing Tobacco

"I just wanted to throw in a fat hogger," complained Alpha Phi sister Ainsley Ambrose after she was expelled from chapter for pulling out a tin of Grizzly. Ainsley's incident is the latest in a string of conflicts that have arisen from the WashU sorority's recent dipping ban. Alpha Phi national representative Brooke Sinclair explained to WUnderground that "while every sister may enjoy a good diggie now and then, we can't have our girls showing visible lipskis on Instagram. Something had to be done."

The controversy started after sister Ingram Garrett spent the sorority's entire Red Dress Gala with an obtrusively large lip burger bulging out of her otherwise flawless complexion. The resulting photos of Ingram outraged Alpha Phi alumni, who threatened to cut off donations if they kept seeing sisters with fat lips.

Garratt admitted that "things got a little out of hand that night," and that usually she tries to keep it classy by spitting her lobs into her Hydro Flask. Ambrose was reflective as well: "I'm not, like, always so public about sticking in a chuddy. Most chapters, I'm more lowkey about it and just sneak out for a spanish quickie."

However, Alpha Phi's clampdown on hogs has advanced beyond moderation. Leadership also found that chaw-themed paraphernalia like Packin Chews and Bangin' Jews MacBook stickers did not align with chapter values. As Ambrose said, "their motives are good, but their methods are downright totalitarian."

Sister Morgan Niles told WUnderground,

"I honestly don't know how long it will be until chews are once again welcome in this sorority." The only speculation she could offer was an ominous declaration that "the chawshank redemption is coming."
